FROM LOG CABINS TO HIGHRISES: URBAN LIFE IN RUSSIA

Life in urban Russia has been very different from that in America. Russians have lived through revolutions, housing shortages, the collapse of the Soviet Union, and great changes in the economy. Come learn about daily life in Russian cities and towns, from high-rise apartment buildings in mega-cities to wooden houses in rural villages and how Russians escape the pressures of urban living by retreating to their dachas.

Sharon Hudgins is a former university professor, an award-winning author, and a journalist with more than 900 articles published worldwide. Together with Tom Hudgins, an economics professor at Collin College, she lived in two Russian cities during the mid-1990s when both of them were professors with the University of Maryland's program in Siberia and the Russian Far East.
