Rusty Two

Rock Morris
Collin College

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.collin.edu/forces

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://digitalcommons.collin.edu/forces/vol2015/iss1/38

This Photograph is brought to you for free and open access by DigitalCommons@Collin. It has been accepted for inclusion in Forces by an authorized editor of DigitalCommons@Collin. For more information, please contact mtomlin@collin.edu.
TRUEST TRUST
Beth Turner Ayers

The greener grass
Called from the other side.
Of course we wanted to go there,
To let our youth wander in another world,
See sights unseen, gather souvenirs.
The other side, not easily accessible,
Guarded by the silent sentinel
Seems a daunting task, but possible.
Entry requires cooperation,
Access requires the truest trust.
I volunteer to be the first
To venture onto new soil.
I place my hands with care and
Push down hard, avoiding rusty barbs,
Guardians to the field of wonders.
And I trust her, like best friends do,
To push upward on the top wire,
Knowing that she fully understands
That my life is in her hands.
One prick and I must endure
The torturous tetanus shot,
Praying that it works to

Prevent that campfire story clincher,
The dreaded lock jaw and
Wasting away in agony.
With wire opening wider,
I lift one leg across the Teeth lined jaws of the shark,
And I do not breathe as I
Lean through to touch new earth,
To straddle then pass through
The mouth of the beast.
We are separated for a moment,
Friends, divided by danger,
But she trusts me, like best friends do.
So we reach our goal,
Ready to explore,
Knowing that we must pass, again,
Through the jaw of the beast
To be home in time for supper.