A Translation of Marcio Veloz Maggiolo's "Interpretacion de Suenos" - Interpretation of Dreams

Taylor Lane

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.collin.edu/forces

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://digitalcommons.collin.edu/forces/vol2013/iss1/3

This Short Story is brought to you for free and open access by DigitalCommons@Collin. It has been accepted for inclusion in Forces by an authorized editor of DigitalCommons@Collin. For more information, please contact mtomlin@collin.edu.
Patricio Infante awoke that day with a storm in his head: he had dreamt about lottery numbers. Even though it was against his beliefs, he was supposed to buy the ticket that would turn him into a millionaire. He was a Christian man, a high school teacher, and not much given to ambition. This dream had upset him: not only did he need to get the ticket, but he shouldn’t pay for it, either; only in this way would the dream be fulfilled, as his ancestor had explained to him in the dream.

His head was spinning and he found no way to escape the confusion. By mid-morning, he had abandoned the idea, but an hour later he had taken it up once more. His major objection to the idea was that he needed to pilfer something from an unfortunate lottery vendor who could scarcely get anything to eat from the sale of his tickets.

He asked his wise wife for advice, and she recommended: “If you steal the ticket and it wins, go and give twenty percent to the same man you took it from and give another twenty percent to our church, and then the damage will be undone.”

So he decided to do it her way.

He spent more than four hours searching for the number he would need to get. But that ticket seemed not to exist. Totally relieved, he decided to return home. He was driving his car down an avenue in the city when he had to stop at a traffic light. A lottery vendor drew near and told him: “Here is the number that you’re looking for. Buy it, and tonight you will be a millionaire.”

Patricio was stunned when he saw the number—the same one he was looking for.