Dulcinea

Mirtha Aertker
Collin College

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.collin.edu/forces

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://digitalcommons.collin.edu/forces/vol2008/iss1/5

This Photograph is brought to you for free and open access by DigitalCommons@Collin. It has been accepted for inclusion in Forces by an authorized editor of DigitalCommons@Collin. For more information, please contact mtomlin@collin.edu.
I am Afraid

Allison Smith

I am afraid of bony fingers
And if they are cold, it’s even worse.
I can feel them around my neck already.
A nervous hand, I’d chop off my arm.
Watch how still I am in the water, I barely make a wave.
If I leave the water running, I can’t hear your voice,
So I haven’t bathed for days.
I’d recognize your voice if you were behind me.

Turn around.
I love your voice
Imprinted in my head,
Each inflection like a filthy hand
On a white wall.
If you say you love me,
I’ll drown.
If you say you love me,
I’ll destroy
Everything.

I’ve seen rain and fire
Together.
In the rain
a woman in a flannel nightgown, blue and white flowers
Dripping into each other,
Watching her house
Burn.

This is when I need you most.
Blue haze, thick smoke, your unwavering hand cupped over my mouth.
I am not screaming.
I am not suffocating.
I cannot be turned to ash.

The Cantonese custom of exhumation
After seven years, the bodies of the dead are exhumed
And the bones are scraped and cleaned and sent to the village of origin.

Where shall I send myself?
Who will claim my life?
The lines of my palm are deep.
They dig below the surface of my skin
Inscribe my bones
And crack
Like dried mud.
Buried in these cracks is the history of my life.
Break me in half and you will find yourself in the marrow
That spills to the floor.