Nob[bdy]'s Revenge

Elizabeth Ann Sedgwick

Throughout time a story of revenge has to be told
An ancient story - it never grows old.
Even though the names change,
And the surrounding circumstances range,
This is where it all began
In what could be called an uncivilized land.
A man named Nobody and his crew
Set out to explore a cave because that is what he wanted to do.
With wine and gold talents, they pursued
To the home of a barbarian - or so they assumed.
The place was empty except for animals and cheese.
The crew wanted to take it back to the ship; they even said, "Please."
But Nobody insisted they stay on.
Little did he know eventually that some of his men would be gone.
The crew heard sounds and ran for the wall.
In came a man named Cy; he was big and tall.
When Cy saw the intruders, he questioned who they were.
Nobody replied, "I am Nobody, Sir."
Cy had no emotion to be expressed.
He ate two men of the crew - the others were repressed.
With this, Cy rested and Nobody took his sword
And stabbed Cy in the gut - what a useless reward.
Two more of the crew were eaten in the morning.
Nobody was so angered his levels were soaring,
So he decided to make a stake with his crew.
With four men to help they knew just what to do.
Two men were had for the supper of Cy;
Nobody had to harm him - he had to try.
Nobody offered Cy some wine,
And after a few drinks, Cy was feeling fine.
After more and more drinks, Cy was drunk as could be.
Subsequently Cy passed out and slept like a baby.
The time had come to fix the wrong.
Nobody got all his men who were really strong.
They gouged the stake in the eye of Cy
And a piercing scream was heard rather than the tranquility of the night sky.
With the blood that flowed Nobody said to Cy,
"Now we are even - an eye for an eye."
